BREAK THE VICIOUS CYCLE OF CLIMATE MALNUTRITION

Malnutrition and climate change are two interconnected crises that reinforce each other. Disadvantaged populations, particularly in low- and middle-income countries, are the most vulnerable, with limited access to nutritious food and healthcare. Gender norms exacerbate malnutrition among women, while climate change impacts all sectors related to nutrition. At the same time, food systems remain a major driver of greenhouse gas emissions, fueling the climate crisis. A virtuous cycle can emerge by integrating low-carbon and climate-resilient systems that meet nutritional needs while reducing emissions. This session will explore the links between climate and nutrition, present solutions to strengthen the resilience of key systems, and highlight promising approaches in Costa Rica, Cameroon, and Cambodia, with a focus on climate financing for nutrition.
